

Corascendea became affected by the weight of suffering that she feels descended from her suspension, by the death of two vulnerable Slovaks who trusted and needed her, and by the birth of a disabled child the mother was due to abort. But she would never contemplate harming herself, or to take her own life, due to her commitments towards others and because suicide, as a form of an escape from pressures of life, is an unacceptable solution to someone who is a Cathar.

Instead, she dedicated herself to her spiritual work and to writing, and her realizations of the recent years in form of many essays and articles attracted readers in all parts of the World. The Cathar Testament, of which she is the author, and her articles on the Cathars, had been published on many professional webs in English, Slovak, and Czech. A novel inspired by her work by an established international author based in Germany was published in Slovakia in 2013, and a similar e-book in English was launched in the same year. Both authors were in touch with Dr Cathar during the writing of their works. Dr Cathar's own research on the Shroud of Turin in 2013 has proven that the man in the Shroud almost certainly could not have been Jesus Christ, but most likely was Jacques de Molay, the last Grandmaster of the Knights Templar. While still living in Europe, Dr Cathar was fluent in seven European languages. Her PhD is in Sociology and Philosophy and she is a British academic author in the field of international business management.

The events and how others approached them meant, that Corascendea has lost every interest to participate in society, which she feels, loses the right to call it-self "human" on the day when police start persecuting those who stand up against crime, physicians look the other way as bureaucrats kill, and state television broadcasts lies to eliminate the witness. God speaks to Corascendea and although she wishes nothing more than to return to Him, she now looks forward to the future. God tells her that by 2016 Justice will have been done with those harming her.

God further tells her, that the experiences she was put through as an infinitely loving and innocent human being, will in not too distant future be taught about in schools, and will eventually lead to this world becoming a better place. There is nothing more that she could want.

The events taking place had been predicted for many centuries. The proof that the World did not believe is in that it happened.
